COAL IN UMATILLA

JOSEPH McLAUGHLIN OF GURDANE, THE DISCOVERER.

East Oregonian Printed Story of the Find a Year Ago—Development on the Mine Has Been Checked by a Cave-In in the Tunnel—Coal Was Found in Fragmentary Particles on the Surface and an Immense Body Was Struck at Depth of 40 Feet—Work Will Be Resumed This Winter.

A year ago this month, the East Oregonian printed the first story of the discovery of coal in Umatilla, in the vicinity of Gurdane, Joseph McLaughlin, the pioneer sawmill man of the Upper Butter creek, discovered croppings on his land three and a half miles south of Gurdane and 45 miles from Pendleton, on one fork of Butter creek, and immediately began tunnelling beneath the cropping in hopes of intersecting the vein at a depth of 50 feet or so beneath the surface.

The first visible cropping was found near a little spring on the brow of a hill, with every evidence of a large deposit of good coal in the hill. Instead of opening up the hillside where the cropping was found, Mr. McLaughlin thought from the dip of the apparent ledge, that he could get under it and make the mining easier by beginning down the hill about 50 feet.

The tunnel was opened, and work pushed on it all last winter, the tunnel being timbered as it was dug. When in the hillside about 40 feet, the vein of coal was struck. It was of the highest grade coal, in a body about seven feet in depth, dipping to the northwest at an angle of about 40 degrees. The tunnel was run into the hill, beside the vein, which, when first discovered appeared to set on edge, until a depth of 65 feet was reached, when the water and soft clay mud began caving in the tunnel so rapidly that the dirt could not be removed. The entire back end of the tunnel was choked by the caving mud, until a hole eight feet across actually caved out and opened up a shaft to the surface, about 40 feet in length. The tunnel was completely choked up until it was impossible to work at the ledge until the tunnel was cleaned. The cave-in made an excellent airshaft, which was needed, as the air in the tunnel was very bad.

Mr. McLaughlin has been busy with his stock and farm during the summer and has not had time to open it up, but this winter will open the tunnel, curb the shaft that has caved in from the surface and will begin mining on the vein in a systematic manner.

The quality of the coal is the best and croppings are found on the brow of the same hill a half, and three-quarters of a mile away. D. F. Burrows, five miles south of the McLaughlin claim, has a fine coal prospect and that entire country has coal croppings on the surface at different places. Extending from Heppner to the Upper John Day, the same coal indications are found in many places, proving that a large body of coal underlies that district at some depth.

Where the first croppings were found by Mr. McLaughlin, the little vein looked to be divided into two parts about 15 inches apart, and each coal vein being about two feet in thickness. All the surface croppings indicate a fragmentary vein, or what would be called a "blow-out," in a quartz mine.
